Belisama

Anon

Belisama lay alone in her bed as the tides of the river flow over her head the consorts she had in the great days of sail all now departed, her city grown frail

Recalling times past, when as a young maiden she carried the great ships with cargo full laden she remembers with yearning the great days of yore the hustle and bustle she heard on her shore

Now age leaves her lonely, she wonders with sorrow for her and her city, will there be a tomorrow ? she watches the flying craft filling the skies she thinks of her great ships of yore and she cries

But men come and go, yet the river remains and as she knows, well, the times they do change life blood of the earth, she will always be needed and the future it is, by the past, always seeded

She will see the great sailing ships never again but the life of the river is not always men now cleaner, she may see the return of old friends and carry the salmon once more to his end.

Belisama is the goddess of the river Mersey.
